DESCRIPTION

The present course aims at equipping teacher students with the tools for supporting the writing of their research reports in a short term; their research articles in middle term, and their further publications in a long term such as a book. Along these lines, diverse topics around the mechanics of writing for the research report, events abstracts and the research article for academic journals constitute chief areas of discussion and practice throughout the development of the syllabus. Although there will be different textual samples of expository writing on which students will work, the key resource corresponds to their research proposals. Therefore, the majority of classes will require students' research projects ongoing sections. As the construction of a text in all of the possible discursive genres, but especially in the expository one is an everlasting and formative process, this course promotes peer reading and feedback as a complementary strategy to the traditional unidirectional and top down ones.

COURSE GOALS

1. To explore and practice the mechanics of writing underlying the expository text as teacher students' research projects.
2. To reflect upon teachers' roles as critical researchers and writers.
3. To transform the expository text in different types of academic formats for events.
4. To connect writing and reading as interdependent practices within the construction of student teachers' research projects and thesis.

TOPICS

- Research reports and abstracts structures (The expository genre)
- Paragraphs and sentence construction in academic writing
- Ethical issues in academic writing
- Process of writing
- Elements of writing and APA Manual (7th ed. In contrast to 6th editions).
- Vocabulary for writing

METHODOLOGY

The present course will be developed through practical workshops informed by different guidelines students need to read at home and practice. Each class through a virtual meeting will be devoted to a particular academic writing topic through co-explanatory teaching strategies and practical activities based on students' papers related to their research proposals. To complement direct work, student teachers will co-work as providers of constructive. This digital scenario will complement synchronous interactions.

In relation to students' duties, we can list them as follows:

- Students should attend every session on time.
- Students should read be ready to practice the academic writing item discussed.
- Students should participate in every class workshop proposed.
- Students should listen to and give constructive feedback to each other regarding their written productions.
